up in a segregated society and witnessed firsthand the injustices faced by her people. She became involved in the civil rights movement in the 1940s and quickly rose through the ranks, becoming a leader in the fight for desegregation and voting rights.

One of Alexander's most significant accomplishments was her work on the Little Rock Nine. In 1957, nine African American students were enrolled at Central High School in Little Rock, Arkansas, and faced violent opposition from white mobs and the Arkansas National Guard. Alexander played a key role in supporting the students and their families, and she helped to organize the Little Rock Nine's legal defense. The integration of Central High School was a major victory for the civil rights movement, and Alexander's contributions were instrumental in its success.
